

The morning sun rose over the quiet hills,
and the village below began to stir.

A baker opened his shutters with a yawn.

Two children raced along the river path,
their laughter carried on the cool wind.

Far away, a bell rang nine slow times.

The day had started, as days always do,
with nothing more than light and sound.

It rolled across the fields and woke the geese,
who answered with a chorus of their own.

By noon the market square was full of carts,
and every stall had something bright to sell.

An old man sat beneath the chestnut tree
and told the children stories of the sea.

When evening came the lamps were lit again,
and the hills grew quiet, as they always do.
